

Daigo Nishijo is a PhD student at the University of Tokyo, where he is conducting research in the field of cardiovascular genome editing. His current work focuses on correcting congenital heart disease-related mutations using Prime Editing. He is particularly interested in genetic cardiomyopathy and is exploring gene correction approaches in mouse models. His goal is to contribute to the development of genome editing-based therapies for genetic cardiomyopathy.